

The Chrysanthum identity was developed as a reflection of ownership within design practice. As a studio, it represents a curated visual language that unifies multiple projects under a single authorship. This reinforces the idea that design outputs are not isolated objects, but part of a broader system of identity and value.

"kri sanTHəməm"

CHRYSANTHUM

ART OF THE LAYER

For my Final Major Project, I am establishing Chrysanthum (kri sanTHəməm), a multidisciplinary design studio that will serve as my professional practice upon graduation. The name a stylized distillation of Chrysanthemum represents the brand's core philosophy: "Art of the Layer." Just as the flower is composed of individual petals, this project explores how various design niches Branding, Web graphic design, Typography, 3D Visualization, Content Creation and Print converge to create a singular, sophisticated brand experience. My FMP objective is to develop a comprehensive visual identity and a diverse portfolio of work that demonstrates my technical range and conceptual depth.

Chapter 1- Chrysanthemum

The transition from the botanical "Chrysanthemum" to the brand name Chrysanthum represents an intentional distillation of the natural form into a refined, architectural identity. While the original flower serves as the biological blueprint, the truncation of the suffix "emum" serves two critical strategic purposes. Firstly, it moves the brand away from the literal connotations of a florist or garden shop, signaling instead a contemporary design studio that values brevity and modernism. Secondly, the "-um" ending evokes a sense of Latinate authority and "museum-quality" permanence, transforming an organic noun into a singular, proprietary brand mark. This phonetic sharpening mirrors the studio's design philosophy: taking the complex, multi-layered "petals" of a client's problem and pruning them into a clear, sophisticated, and memorable solution.

WHY-Chrysanthum?& Not chrysanthemums

When i was a young kid i watched this movie "curse of the golden flower" the name of the flower in this is chrysanthemums, and my young mind was so fascinated by the movie and the flower but i couldn't pronounce it i called it chrysanthum and it stuck with me till now.

Mood Board

Why It Was Rejected: While this prototype addresses the structured side of the studio, the resulting visual is too cold and rigid. It fails to convey the organic elegance of the inspiration. In my critique, I determined this was "boring" geometry it lacks the human touch and the rich complexity seen in Curse of the Golden Flower. It is technically sound but emotionally flat.

Why It Was Rejected: This design leans too far into the "fun" and "explosive" attributes, losing all connection to the "premium" and "royal" categories. While the petal metaphor is present, the form itself is overly aggressive and corporate-feeling, lacking sophistication. It is a striking visual, but it is not the right striking visual for the Chrysanthemum brand story.

Development

- Each stroke was made from the petal design of the chrysanthemum flower

Each petal represents different areas of graphic design service the firm can provide

- This prototype is simple, fluid, premium, and sophisticated. It provides a foundation that is unique, scalable, and authentically reflects the Chrysanthemum philosophy

- This sketch represents a radical departure from the other two. It abandons geometry and hard vector lines to embrace a calligraphic, brushstroke-driven aesthetic. The flower is interpreted as a natural, fluid organism

It successfully blends the organic beauty of the flower with the prestige ("royal/premium") of the inspiration film, all while remaining simple.

logo process

I really like the concept of making flower petal to a repetitive pattern and I added the color which I had in mind, I made the basic petal in illustrator

but I was displeased on how it looked very unaligned

So I made one with alignment and everything symmetrical I found this more neat and beautiful to go with it

At this stage i could not decide which to go with both of the design looked good

In the final refinement stage, I compared two containment strategies: the Boundless Square and the Imperial Circle. I ultimately selected the Circle Container for the primary brand mark. This choice was driven by the desire to evoke the "Imperial Crest" aesthetic inspired by Curse of the Golden Flower. The circular boundary acts as a visual 'holding shape,' transforming the organic, hand-drawn petals into a formal seal. This provides the necessary 'Premium' weight required for a design studio, ensuring the logo remains legible and iconic at smaller scales.

Final Logo

"kri sanTHəməm"

CHRYSANTHUM

ART OF THE LAYER

Final Typography

Typeface-Fraunce

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz

Design Rationale:

Color Psychology

"While initial research into Curse of the Golden Flower suggested a gold palette, I ultimately pivoted to a vibrant Imperial Red on Obsidian. This choice was made to differentiate Chrysanthum from traditional luxury brands that rely on metallic cliches. The red symbolizes passion, vitality, and the 'living' nature of a bloom, while the dark background maintains the necessary prestige and depth. This combination ensures the studio feels contemporary, energetic, and distinct within the competitive graphic design landscape."